

A detailed diagram of a moss leaf cross-section. The leaf is elongated and tapers to a point. It is composed of numerous small, rectangular cells arranged in a regular, brick-like pattern. The cells are colored in shades of green, with some cells showing internal structures like cell walls and chloroplasts. The leaf is shown in a slightly curved, folded position, illustrating its structure and how it might trap water.

